Timothy Shue

Timothy is a communications specialist with a background in environmental geography and politics, with applied experience fostering collaboration, communicating and applying knowledge for environmental decision-making and management. He has several years' experience working and volunteering for local, national and international not-for-profits and currently works as the chief operating officer at the Yarra Energy Foundation, a not-for-profit connecting people with better energy for a zero carbon future.

He is interested in climate communication strategy and loves exploring ways to bridge research and practice. He has a Master of Environment in Sustainable Cities, and is the co-host and producer of the podcast, Talking In This Climate, helping listeners to be more mindful about how they communicate climate change. Timothy is a mentor for the University of Melbourne's Wattle Fellowship, a global sustainability leadership program, and enjoys cycling along the Yarra River and playing board games with friends.
